

GCG Game Plan

The screens, and why each one exists

GCG's team operating system. People onboard by playing a six-minute game that produces their player card. Each person gets a Home that answers three questions: what is GCG doing, where do I fit, and what do you need from me right now. Hinda plans events from templates, the system suggests the best person for each task and explains why, and every event reads as a journey: Plan, Prep, Check, Play, Report. Every contribution leaves a visible trail, recorded for fair credit later.

All screens use sample data with made-up names and a sample event. Shown at phone width.

The whole point, and the prompt for a design review

I run Gold Coast Games (GCG), a small events company in Accra, Ghana, that runs game nights and corporate game experiences. Attached are phone screenshots of our team app, GCG Game Plan, with what each screen does and why.

The whole point of the app: a busy, mostly unpaid team member opens it and within 30 seconds knows three things, without feeling overwhelmed:

1. What is GCG doing right now?
2. Where do I fit?
3. What is the one thing I need to do next?

The rule that matters most: people must never see the whole event plan at once. They should see only the portion that matters now: the tasks for the current stage of the event, ordered by priority and deadline. Everything later stays hidden until they choose to look. Finishing what is in front of them should feel like clearing a level and moving to the next one, not like a long to-do list. Events move through five stages: Plan, Prep, Check, Play, Report.

Onboarding is creating your profile: a short card game (situations, jobs that might suit you) that produces a player card, then the profile: what you have done, what you bring, your proudest work, your CV (link or pasted text), a photo if you like, how you work best and why you are here. It must feel welcoming and personal, save progress so people can stop and come back, and never feel like an HR form.

What already exists: a Home with one "next move", a "then" line and a note about later tasks; events shown as a five-stage journey; task cards with a deadline, why you were picked, one big action, and quieter "can't do it" and "not really me" options; a private profile with a shareable player card and a record of everything you have done at GCG; and an admin side for me (Today, Events, Team, Insights). The visual style: warm cream background, red, gold and green bands from the Ghana flag, chunky outlined game-piece shapes, playful but professional.

Please:

1. Tell me where the current screens still feel overwhelming or unclear, screen by screen, and why.
2. Show how to make "only what matters now" even stronger: what a member sees at each stage of an event, and how finishing a stage should feel.
3. Suggest how onboarding and profile creation can feel quicker and more personal, including the photo and CV steps, without losing the information we need.
4. Keep it simple: no new features unless they remove effort. No points, badges, leaderboards, chat or availability tracking.
5. Finish with a precise design brief for my developer (an AI coding assistant): screen by screen, what to show, what to hide, the order of elements, and the one primary action on each screen. Phone first, 390px wide.

01 Welcome

WHAT IT SHOWS

What the app is for, about 10 minutes, stop anytime, four short levels (you, situations, jobs, your profile), and the reward: your player card.

WHY IT MATTERS

Sets expectations so a busy person starts relaxed. Progress is saved, so nobody loses work or feels guilty for stopping.

02 Warm-up

WHAT IT SHOWS

Pick the kinds of work you lose track of time doing.

WHY IT MATTERS

An easy first tap that gets people moving and gives an early signal about their interests.

WARM-UP

What kind of work makes you lose track of time?

Pick as many as you like.

Talking and working with people

Making things: design, video, writing

Solving technical problems and working with tools

Organising, planning and keeping things on track

Working with numbers, records and detail

Looking after people, places or things

Building relationships and persuading people

03 Situations

WHAT IT SHOWS

Seven real situations: tap the option most like you, then the one least like you.

WHY IT MATTERS

Choosing between good options is harder to fake than rating yourself, so the card is honest. Seven is the fewest that still measures every strength twice.

04 Jobs that might suit you

WHAT IT SHOWS

Six GCG jobs matched to the answers so far. Yes, maybe or not for me.

WHY IT MATTERS

People say what they want and do not want, in concrete jobs rather than abstract traits. This drives task suggestions.

The player card

WHAT IT SHOWS

The reward: name, type (The Welcomer + Deal Maker) and three strengths, centred and screenshot-friendly. Then one question: does this sound like you?

WHY IT MATTERS

People feel seen, and the card powers task matching. One primary action: save the card and open your Game Plan.

WHAT IT SHOWS

Right after the card: what you have actually done, as quick taps. Then what you bring (skills, tools, contacts).

WHY IT MATTERS

Anything counts: school, church, work, a side hustle, helping a friend.

- ☒ Planned an event or ran a project to a deadline

A photo (optional)

WHAT IT SHOWS

Add a photo of yourself. It is shrunk on the phone and shown on your card, Home and the crew list, as part of your About.

WHY IT MATTERS

Makes the profile personal and the player card feel like yours.

What do you want the crew to see?

WHAT IT SHOWS

Your About is always shared. Jobs I am up for, what I have done, what I bring, my proudest work, how I work best and my CV are each a one-tap choice, private by default.

WHY IT MATTERS

People choose what to share, and newcomers can still see who does what. Reasons for being here and jobs you would rather not do are never shared.

The screenshot shows a mobile app interface for 'GOLD COAST GAMES'. At the top, there's a header with a back arrow, 'Level 4 of 4 · Your profile', and '4 / 4'. Below this is a progress bar with four segments: red, yellow, green, and red. The main content area is titled 'YOUR PROFILE' and features the question 'What do you want the crew to see?'. A subtext explains: 'Your About is always visible, so newcomers can see who does what. The rest is your choice. You can change it any time under Me.' Below this, there are seven settings cards, each with a title and a privacy toggle:

- Your About: Name, photo, type, strengths and title. Always visible to the crew, so newcomers can see who does what. Shared
- Jobs I'm up for: Private
- What I've done: Private

WHAT IT SHOWS

How many things to do now (not in total), the dominant next move with why you and one button, one Then line, and a quiet note that more tasks open later. Below: what GCG is doing as a five-stage journey.

WHY IT MATTERS

Answers in seconds: what is GCG doing, where do I fit, what do you need from me now. Only the current portion of work is counted, so nobody is overwhelmed.

WHAT IT SHOWS

Also: your place (type, strengths, tasks and events done, finish your profile) and the next whole-crew date with one calendar button.

WHY IT MATTERS

Everything a member needs without visiting another screen.

WHAT IT SHOWS

WHY IT MATTERS

Everything stays readable and on brand in dark mode.

WHAT IT SHOWS

WHY IT MATTERS

My world, not GCG's whole world.

An event as a journey

WHAT IT SHOWS

Plan, Prep, Check, Play, Report. Done stages lock in green, the current stage is larger and marked NOW, with how ready the event is and the latest finished tasks.

WHY IT MATTERS

People understand a journey faster than a list, and see their contribution land.

Your part: only what matters now

WHAT IT SHOWS

The event page shows only the tasks for the current stage, most urgent first, at most three at a time. Later tasks sit folded under Later in the plan, grouped by stage.

WHY IT MATTERS

Nobody sees the whole plan at once. Clearing what is in front of you opens the next portion.

WHAT IT SHOWS

Deadline first, then the task and event. One big Take it. Quieter: Can't do it, and Not really me (fewer tasks like this).

WHY IT MATTERS

Readable in two seconds. Saying no is easy and never hides the task: it goes straight back to the pool.
